Perhaps the most successful episode of mass escape from slavery in North America occurred, not along the well-known routes from South to North, but on a route from South to further south, into Florida. Those who escaped along this route, along with their allies, built the largest and most resilient independent community of former slaves in what became the US. And they mounted the most protracted and effective armed resistance ever against the British/US Slavocracy. This story of escape and resistance is the story of the Seminole people.

The Seminoles first emerged as a distinct people in Spanish Florida during the mid 1700s, formed by groups from several Native American tribes and by fugitive slaves of African descent who were all refugees from European colonialism. From their very beginnings, the Seminoles were a bi-racial/ethnic people who intermarried across lines of descent and blended African and Indian cultures. The name Seminole was probably derived from the Spanish word cimarron (in English, maroon) which denotes a community of escaped slaves.

Over much of a century, the Seminoles received fugitive slaves — maybe several thousand — while driving back the cross-border raids of slave catchers and military units from the north. Florida’s Spanish colonial government welcomed the Seminoles as a buffer against, and a resource drain on, the rival Anglo-American colonialism. Then in the late 1810s, the US military waged full-scale war on the Seminoles, and the Seminoles again prevailed.

However, in the 1830s, a decade after Spain seceded Florida to the US, the federal government began removing Indian peoples from the southeast. The Seminoles resisted, and the Second Seminole War erupted in 1835. By 1842, the Seminoles were exhausted and agreed to transportation to Indian Territory. But when the US government insisted that the Black Seminoles first be “returned” to slavery in the South, the Seminoles as a whole refused, and the US, faced with the possibility of renewed war, backed down.

The majority of the Seminoles, of both indigenous and African descent, were moved west, although some (Continued on page 4)

The Myers Residence - An Update

The past month has been a time we have long awaited! Beginning on May 6th construction crews began addressing some of the repair needs that were identified through the various studies that have been done by Stephen Tilly Architects and Robert Silman Associates engineering firm. Each day another step and a little more work has been completed. The old rear porch which has been deemed non-historic has been removed. Brick problems, where courses of brick were missing on the front of the building and along the east side, have been re-bricked and repaired.

Inside the building where engineers were uncertain of the strength of certain areas the building has been shored up with scaffolding and timbers from the basement through the third floor. Within the attic special procedures are being taken to help the wall areas at the point of the roof do a better job of holding the roof frames in place.

Our sign for participation in the Environmental Protection Program funding has been put up on the front of the building. The wooden steps in the front of the Residence have been replaced with a more durable construction of wooden stairs.

As construction moves forward one can expect to find the various recommendations made within the recently completed Historic Structure Report put into effect. The report, completed just this past February, presented a range of repair recommendations and offered directions as to how the reconstruction and restoration work should proceed. Now for the Master Plan, archeological study, and Phase 1 and 2 restoration plans!

stayed, and Black and Indian Seminole communities exist to this day in the Midwest and in Florida. These communities, despite the daunting problems they face, are the legacy of an amazing and heroic chapter in the history of the resistance to slavery and, indeed, of the southern Underground Railroad.
